Falling Asleep in Walmart Line Gets Man Called In

The $9 Million Renewable Energy Ponzi Scheme

Ponzi scheme that used cow manure to create renewable energy.

Daniel Smith

(see Walmart pg. 3)

When Ray Brewer was looking to make a ton of money, he tapped into the renewable energy industry. From March 2014 through December 2019, Brewer ultimately stole more than $8 million from investors by claiming to build anaerobic digesters on dairies in California and Idaho.

Brewer orchestrated a company that allegedly built anaerobic digesters to convert cow manure into usable energy. According to Brewer, these digesters could then generate revenue and returns for company investors. Brewer told investors they would receive rights to the natural gas, Renewable Energy Credits (RECs), and tax incentives produced by the digesters.

But Brewer never built the digesters; they didn't even exist. It was a scam—and Brewer used the money from investors for his own personal expenditures.

As part of the scam, Brewer falsely claimed to be an engineer and sought investors who had ties to the dairy industry or green energy industry. Brewer invested in paid advertisements in trade publications and

We arrived on the scene and observed an elderly white female lying in the driveway propped up on her forearm. The female was identified as the victim. She stated there were more people in the house. After a few minutes, we observed a vehicle coming down the driveway along with a male walking behind the vehicle. Due to the severity of the call and no location of the suspect, both males were detained. After additional units arrived on the scene, Kirkland along with Deputy Lane were tasked with transporting the 2 detained males to the sheriff's office for further questioning from our CID unit. The female was transported to UT Medical Center for her injuries.

industry-specific online advertisements. He also targeted investors at industry-specific conferences.

According to the FBI Sacramento Case Agent, "Brewer established a pattern of fraudulent behavior over many years. He consistently exaggerated his qualifications, was repeatedly untruthful, and falsified information."

To convince investors that his company and digesters were real, Brewer created a slew of fake documents, including fake digester construction schedules, invoices for project-related costs, and digester power generation reports. He found stock photos of digesters in different stages of completion and sent them to his investors.

Brewer also took investors on tours of dairies where he claimed he would build the digesters. And while Brewer had legitimate lease agreements with some dairies, other agreements were completely made-up.

"There was just a myriad of lies and documents that were passed along to these investors to convince them that it was all real," said the case agent. "For instance, Brewer sent at least one investor a forged contract with a multinational company in which that company purported to agree to purchase byproducts generated by these anaerobic digesters—when it's processed, you get the methane, but then the byproducts are essentially a liquid fertilizer and compostable material." In other words, investors could profit off the methane and these additional byproducts.

In addition, Brewer altered bank letters, in one case changing a letter to say that the bank had committed to lending him up to $100 million to build his anaerobic digesters. However, as the case agent explained, this was not the reality: "The real letter from the bank actually states that the bank had not committed to lending any money to Brewer, and in fact needed to conduct due diligence before they could make a final decision as to whether or not they would lend him money or open any type of joint credit."

When investors sent Brewer money, he transferred the funds into multiple bank accounts he had opened under different identities and with fake descriptions to hide the locations, sources, ownership, and control of the money.

In some instances, Brewer claimed to refund investors all or some of their money—but the reality was that he was paying off his initial investors with money from his newest investors while keeping a chunk of money for himself. This type of financial fraud is referred to as a Ponzi scheme.

Brewer used the money he kept for himself to buy a 12-acre plot of land in Montana, a 3,700 square foot custom home in California, and new pickup trucks.

Investors became skeptical when they weren't getting the full return on investments as Brewer promised. They wanted answers and filed civil lawsuits against Brewer. When Brewer found out, he moved to Montana and assumed a new identity. He placed his assets in his wife's name and in other aliases he created. For instance, he used his wife's name when he purchased a house and land in Montana.
